With the release of Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas merely a week away, Rockstar Games has updated the game's official Web site to include lots of new information on Las Venturas, a desert city inspired by Las Vegas. The site features information on landmarks and other places of interest in the city, which, in GTA tradition, are clearly based on real-world locations--but injected with plenty of biting irony.

In addition, a brand new trailer for the game has been released. Featuring some of the dialogue, cutscenes, and action from the full game, the trailer also reveals some surprising, new gameplay elements, such as the ability to bail out of airplanes by parachute. Notably, the trailer is set to the thumping beat of Tupac's "I Don't Give Fk." The song is uncensored in the trailer, much like it will be in the game--as such, parental discretion is advised before viewing. This latest trailer is available for download from their Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas media page .
