Hip-hop rap artist The Game found out that laws and rules apply to everyone, be it a hip-hop star or not.

On Sunday, August 28, a representative from 310 Footwear's security team contacted MAGIC Marketplace's security representatives, Special Operations Associates (SOA) Security, to solicit assistance with hip-hop rap artist The Game's scheduled appearance. SOA was also contacted by the Las Vegas Police Department, which had earlier been informed by 310's security as well. SOA then briefed MAGIC representatives of this communication.

Show and security officials concluded that 310 Footwear was not equipped to handle the additional security measures required, and other options should be considered. In response, an alternative appearance location was offered, one that would be potentially less disruptive to business being done on the show floor. After reviewing the space, 310 Footwear declined the offer.

On Tuesday morning, August 30, Compton hip-hop rap artist The Game arrived at the event site an hour earlier than scheduled accompanied by five bodyguards; at least two of whom were allegedly armed. After being informed by security officials that this was a direct violation of trade show rules, all were escorted off the show premises. MAGIC officials attempted to re-schedule rapper The Game's appearance contingent on adherence to the concealed weapons policy, but the rap artists camp refused.

Due to security and public safety concerns, hip-hop rap artist The Game was not provided access to the world's largest fashion trade show event, the MAGIC Marketplace, officials confirmed. The artist -- who was accompanied by bodyguards allegedly carrying concealed weapons -- had been scheduled to make a booth appearance on behalf of one of MAGIC's exhibitors, 310 Footwear.

Rap artist The Game was not "kicked out" of the show, as is being reported by various media for possible involvement in the recent shooting of Death Row Records Founder and CEO;
